The U.S. & European stock markets closed marginally up, attempting to forget the losing ways of last week.

There was no significant U.S. economic data other than the U.S. Retail Gas price that rose 0.56% and is just -4.55% below last year; investors' focus turned back to interest rates, inflations, and the stronger-than-expected U.S. economic growth.

During the rest of the week, the attention turns to a vast array of economic data that begins with Retail sales tomorrow, followed by Exports and Imports, and much more.

The Consensus estimates expect Retail spending to remain strong last month, as summer travel and leisure activity has been solid. As always, the corporate earnings of Lowes, Home Depot, Target, and Walmart will provide an MRI of Consumer Health and spending trends.

As we have highlighted, more data from China points to a weakening economic position as econometric data continues to underscore signs of disinflation and a high risk of deflation in consumer prices. Also, the continued problems with some high-profile Chinese developers have sparked a sell-off in real estate stocks, raising alarm bells that the Second largest world economy is in deeper trouble than most think.
